Notes

Offense — His best ability is probably his feel for the game when it comes to cutting and slashing and the timing element.  True three-level scorer who creates paint penetration consistently using his frame and quick first step. Rim finishing is above average with flashes of elite finishing. He has above-average speed, uses opposing defenses' gravity well, and has a good ball fake also to use to create separation. His shot is better than his 33% 3PT clip suggests I believe. He was 40% as a freshman on less volume but the shot mechanics are really sound and he hits 80% of his free throws and loves a mid-range jumper.  I'd bet on him being a better shooter than that number indicates once he's in a stronger situation. His handle is a bit inconsistent. I've seen him create separation solely from the handle in a major way, but it can also be choppy, and his shot selection can get out of control. As I mentioned he likes the midrange, and he likes getting to a contested two more than I'd like. Though these things may be more a product of the roster and spacing around him on his current team than an issue. He played his best in the biggest games and has the frame of someone who can translate to a higher level. His pick-and-roll ball-handling could develop into more complete playmaking, though he was frequently let down by poor screening. A lot of the times you could tell he was driving with intention to shoot not pass and defenses could tell as well. Better passing ability would do him wonders.

Defense — Really effective navigating screens and staying attached on the hip, but also just having the IQ to know what to do in different coverages. Interestingly, the synergy numbers which are not super informative in theory say that he doesn't handle pick-and-roll coverage well, but my read on tape is the opposite. He occasionally over-helps, but good lateral quickness and balance let him recover when it happens, mixed in with a long wingspan to recover well on contests. Recovery speed is more of a question depending on who beats him. Unsure he's quick enough to recover against a guard who gets by him, or strong enough to recover against a wing who does. Solid awareness as a help defender, consistent on closeouts, and his length bothers shooters. Needs to fill out the frame as he can be susceptible to the occasional bully by a stronger player.

Other notes — High effort, coachable, positive attitude, consistent motor.

Fit Projection

I really do project him as a high-major starter, and potentially one of the better players on a fringe NCAA tournament team. He is a connective piece that I think can play with lots of different player types as well as usage rates.  Given his skill set, I'd rather see him take on a larger role as one of the top players on a mid-conference to weaker level team than come off the bench for a top-25 program, which he could certainly also handle. Just feels pluggable anywhere.

Strengths

- True jack-of-all-trades, prototypical wing who makes a team better
- Comfortable guarding most non-NBA-level talents at the high-major level
- Strong feel cutting and slashing off the ball; an elite finisher once he receives the pass

Concerns / Risk Factors

- Lacks a reliable way to create separation
- Playmaking and passing need development
- Shot selection and overall decision-making can get a bit stubborn

Recommendation

Grade: High-major starter. A versatile, high-effort wing with real scoring and defensive upside, high-major programs, particularly those outside the very top tier, should be calling.
